Hey Alex,

I hope you're doing well! Can you believe the summer holidays are just around the corner? I know you mentioned wanting to find something productive (but not too overwhelming) to do during the break, so I thought I'd drop you a note about some cool online courses I came across.

Last summer, I actually gave a couple of these courses a try-one on creative writing and another on coding basics. They were honestly more fun than I expected and super flexible, so I could fit them around hanging out and relaxing. Plus, I ended up picking up some new skills without having to leave home!

There are loads of options tailored to almost anything you might be interested in-like graphic design, digital marketing, photography, or even learning a new language. Most of the sites, like Coursera, Skillshare, and Udemy, offer bite-sized sessions and projects you can do at your own pace. It's also a nice way to get a taste of something you might want to pursue more seriously later on.

Give it some thought! I think you'd actually enjoy trying out a couple, especially since you were talking about exploring web design or brushing up on your Spanish. If you need any recommendations or want to know which courses I enjoyed, just let me know.

Hope you have an awesome summer, whatever you do! Let's catch up soon.

Take care,
Jamie
